These molded caps were crowned by a sloping member, carefully hewn and shaped from one heavy log of wood so as to provide a sloping wash across the top and front and returned on the two ends; while the carpenter took pains to leave a standing flange at the back over which the siding was broken, thus providing a sort of flashing, but executed entirely in wood! Later in the 18th century, the American builders began to secure the Carpenter s Handbooks, first published in England about 1756, and from these they developed new details far more easily, merely adapting them to the somewhat simplified conditions and requirements of the American village or town in which they lived and worked. Later, the demand...
