For who hath despised the day of small things? I am going to lead you back, my friends, this afternoon, to the day of small things. In a very hasty way - altogether too hasty a way, I propose that we follow, through nearly one hundred and fifty years, the path which the feet of your fathers have worn into the soil, until that path brings us to this place where we worship to-day. It seems to me especially fitting that the pastor of this church should go back into those early years. The history of neither of the Congregational churches in this city can be complete without those antecedents, out of which the life of both has sprung. As two branches of one family, now living apart, but with no family feuds between them, we hail and venerate a common ancestry, as we hold to one and the same Congregational polity, in which we serve one Lord.
