Brand New Book  Print on Demand .INTRODUCTION All of my life, I have wondered why some people are leaders and others are not. This book is sort of an analysis of the relationship between employee, supervisor, manager and leader. In the 1970 s, I had the pleasure of working out of a Pan Am training department office at JFK airport, NY, with a fellow who I observed as having qualities of leadership. I often thought had he been an officer in the trenches, and called let s go, his men, without hesitation, would follow him over the top. He was in management at Pan Am as a Maintenance Technical Instructor. I was conducting classes in management development. Of course, he wasn t a CEO or Vice President, probably because he did not have the necessary formal education, but to me he represented the qualities I would hope to find in those positions. He planned his work, set goals and clearly communicated them to individuals or groups. He comfortably reflected a style of knowledgeable, but modest, self confidence. With a pleasant personality, he seemed to earn the trust of others. It was always evident he had prepared himself through experience and study of the subject he was teaching. I don t know why, but to me, as I saw him perform his work, he was the natural leader 14 JOHN STEARNS type. Even though there were several other well qualified instructors in the group, this instructor, John Romaine, came to mind as I prepared to write this book on the subject of leadership in management. I am aware of the many books, courses, and other materials on the subject of management, and I have...
