These anlagen (5) are also shown in section (fig. 33) in which it is seen that they arise contiguous to the precardinal vein (6). The main question at issue is whether or not such independent endotheliallined anlagen actually exist. If they do exist, the contention that lymphatic endothelium is specific, in the sense that it is invariably derived from that of the veins, can no longer be maintained and the theory that lymphatic endothelium, in general, is of venous origin would then necessarily fall completely to the ground.
